LADY IRENE HATTER

Irene was named after the Greek goddess of peace since she was born in Amsterdam a few days after the creation of the State of Israel. Her Belgian mother and Dutch father saw the twin events, their Jewish daughter and the independence of our people, as auspicious for the post WW2 era. Irene's cosmopolitan background gives her fluency in five languages and has inspired in her a curiosity about the world and a love of travelling.

Coming to London in the 60s to improve her English, she met and married and has two sons and two grandchildren. Married to Maurice for 30 years, their joint families have melded and expanded with plenty to celebrate.

Education, not for an elite but for youngsters from multicultural origins who strive for a better life, has been the touchstone of Maurice and Irene's philanthropy in Israel and in the UK, which was recognised with the knighthood - Sir Maurice and Lady Hatter. This conviction in the power of education extends around the world in their support for the network of ORT schools.

Irene has also been a volunteer for nearly 10 years with Jewish Care, the major UK charity providing services to the elderly and disabled. With World Jewish Relief, Irene and Maurice contributed to the establishment of a site dedicated to Jewish resistance during the Holocaust, in commemoration of Irene's father who had fought with the French Resistance.

Irene and Maurice are one of the University's most dedicated and long-time friends, for which the University is most grateful. This rare connection was sparked by the late Prof. Avner Raban, founder of the Department for Maritime Civilizations. Through his passion for marine studies and their shared love of the sea, Irene and Maurice became dedicated - if not addicted - to maritime research.

Irene and Maurice have been contributing for many years to the Leon Recanati Institute for Maritime Studies, home to the Hatter Laboratory for Coastal and Harbour Archaeology, and of which Irene is now a member of the Executive Committee.

The couple is also greatly involved with student activities, donating generously to various student scholarship programs. In 2010, Irene and Maurice's deep commitment to the students of the University of Haifa was epitomized in the inauguration of the architect designed Hatter Student Building.
